The topic of this talk arose during an ethnographic study of disability and sexuality. The study contrasts two Scandinavian countries, Denmark and Sweden, that are very similar in terms of government support and services for people with disabilities. One significant difference between the two countries, however, concerns the language that people use to speak about people with disabilities. In Sweden, this language is carefully monitored. In Denmark, there is little or no political correctness when it comes to disability. This talk will examine the relationship between politically correct language and ethical engagement. What is the point of advocating politically correct language to talk about something like disability? And what are the consequences for people with disabilities when speakers don’t talk that talk?

Fantasy in Theory and Practice

A Discussion about the erotic stories that young men in a Papua New Guinean village tell one another when they blood let, and how we can use the concept of fantasy to think about them.

Wednesday, November 20th, 2013
4:50pm Sharp to 5:50pm
Dewey 2162